high compared to male prisoners. There were hardly any arrangements for psychiatric treatment and counselling. Other ailments of women were routinely attended. Very few prisons have cared to enlist the assistance of voluntary organisations of their areas in providing counselling, legal aid and other help to women prisoners.

(iii) In jails where vocational training to women inmates was being provided, only the traditional skills were knight and except for one jail, no efforts had been made to update the courses in tune with the times.

(iv) Barring the exclusive women's jails and a lew other common jails, the children accompanying women did not appear to be properly looked after in regard to diet medical aid, education, etc. In some cases, even creches for babies were not provided.

(v) In many jails, recreational facilities were absent or only nominal. Even sanitary facilities were negligible.

(vi) There does not appear to be any initiative taken by Jail Advisory Committees in matters like release of under-trial women prisoners or premature release of women convicts.

These observations were discussed, inter-alia, in the conference of the Inspectors General of Prisoners held in July, 1996 and the need to take corrective measures by the Slates in order to improve the conditions of women prisoners was emphasised. The Central Government proposes to continue its dialogue with the Slate Governments and provide them with financial assistance to improve the functioning of prison administration.
